FACTS ABOUT JUPITER.

Wonderful Figures Fall to Express Enough Concerning the Great Planet.

Our most eminent astronomers do not pretend to give exact reckonings on the great floating worlds outside of our own solar system, but within that monstrous aggregation everything has been reduced to certainty.

His diameter is about 88,000 of our miles, being about eleven times that of our own globe; the circumference 275,000 miles at the equator, which would give the giant a volume exceeding that of the earth by 1,384 times.

Were it possible to bring the earth and Jupiter so close together that the distance separating them would be no greater than that which now separates the earth from the moon—about 240,000 miles—what wondrous sight would be in store for the residents of our little globe.

Since its first introduction Electric Bitters has gained rapidly in popular favor, until now it is clearly in the lead among pure medicinal tonics and alteratives.

HORRORS OF SHAVING.

Whether You Do It Yourself or Go to a Barber, There Are Dangers.

There is a story told of a French nobleman who, when he had been shaved in the morning, always heard the man mutter: "Thank heaven!" on leaving the room. He inquired the reason. "It is the money, my lord, you always leave on your table over night (for he was a gambler). Every morning I say to myself: 'I must cut his throat,' and am truly thankful to have escaped the temptation." After which confession the nobleman shaved himself.

A SPRING POEM. Why the Editor of the Monthly Messenger Accepted It.

Elaine Gray, carrying in her hand the manuscript of a poem--the first fruit of her literary labor--entered the editorial sanctum of the Monthly Messenger with fear and trembling.

"I am the editor, at your service," said the young man, politely. "Pray be seated."

"You!" she exclaimed, then checked herself, and said, with flaming cheeks: "You see, I had supposed that editors were all old and wore spectacles. I don't know what game some ridiculous idea. I'm sure."

"We sometimes find our preconceived notions are wrong," said Mr. Horace Winthrop. "When I was a boy I thought that a bald head and a wart on the nose were the distinguishing characteristics of all doctors, because the only one I happened to know had them."

"Do you accept poetry from an unknown author?" she asked.

"Very seldom," said the editor. "We receive so much verse from authors of established reputation that only by reason of especial merit can we accept contributions from unknown authors. I am always willing to read and pass judgment upon manuscripts, however."

"I have a poem here which I would like to read to you," said the girl, producing her manuscript. "You see, it is a spring poem--this last half apologetically--and I suppose you get plenty of them."

"That is a difficult art indeed," said Mr. Winthrop. "I suppose all poets have found their finer conceptions too subtle to transcribe in black and white. They are like the evanescent charm of a beautiful sunset--glorious to behold, but hard to describe, and soon gone. Will you read your poem?"

Elaine read, in a voice that to Mr. Winthrop seemed very sweet, the following:

All day the sunshine, clear and soft, Has burnished earth with golden sheen: All day the balmy breezes waft you get, Swept from the bosom of the land of green: All day has come the rapturous voice Of tuneful birds from every tree.

"This spring--all nature doth rejoice-- And why not we?"

"All day the distant mist-wreathed hills Have taken yet a greener hue: All day the placid lake reveals A cloudless heaven's cerulean blue: All day the brook its joy has told, While hastening to the distant sea. The world forgets that it is old-- And why not we?"

"All day from former grassy plain Has come the lowing of the herd; And softly falls the low refrain Of insect, bee and tuneful bird. Oh, why should man alone be sad; All shows its happiness but he. The world is bright--creation's glad-- And why not we?"

A pretty girl. Why didn't I think to take her address? She may not call again. I guess she will, though, for she seems to have the literary fever in a mild form.

"Not so bad," was his comment: "considerably above the average for a beginner." It is commonplace, however, much so to publish. But it will do to refuse it, for if I do she will be mortally offended, no doubt, and I will not see her again.

"I thought all editors were old and cross," Elaine observed to Miss Wilson, her "dearest friend," that evening. "Well, aren't they?" asked Miss Wilson.

"No, I took that poem on 'Spring' to the editor of the Monthly Messenger today, and he's a young man, and as nice as he can be. He seemed very much interested while I read the poem to him, and said it was ever so pretty. He asked me to call again, too, and said I seemed to possess talent."

"Perhaps he was more interested in you than in your poem," Miss Wilson sagely remarked. "It's lucky you took it instead of sending it."

"Why, what an idea!" said Elaine, blushing. When she went again to the office of the Monthly Messenger, a few days later, the editor greeted her with a smile.

"I have accepted your poem, Miss Gray," he said. "You write well for a beginner."

"Thank you," she said, gratefully. "I am very much encouraged." "But I warn you," he continued, "that to succeed as an author requires a great deal of hard work and much perseverance, and even those who have been celebrated in letters often question if their success is worth what it cost."

"Oh, I never expect to become famous," said Elaine, innocently. "I will just write a little occasionally for the pleasure of writing."

"By the way," said Mr. Winthrop, hoping to divert her newly-awakened literary energies into another channel, "can you not contribute to our 'Household' or 'Fancy-Work' departments, Miss Gray?"

"Well, perhaps," she said with some hesitation. "Mamma flatters me by saying I am something of a housekeeper, and I might give you my recipe for making the crullers that papa appreciates so highly. And then I am doing a little fancy work, and if you care to have me I can tell you about it."

"Exactly what we want, Miss Gray, and I should like to have you contribute each month. I am sure your cooking receipts will appeal to the popular taste."

"But these subjects are so humdrum and prosy, Mr. Winthrop."

"True, but this is a humdrum world, Miss Gray. Where there is one who will read a poem there are ten who will read a receipt for making crullers."

"But I prefer the appreciation of the one who reads the poem to that of the ten who read the receipt."

"If the receipt is a good one the crullers will be appreciated, even if the author is not, and, besides, they may furnish inspiration for a poem from some grateful epicure."

"Your arguments are unanswerable," said Miss Gray, laughing. "The crullers win the day."

Each month after this Elaine contributed to the Monthly Messenger a few directions for fancy work or one or two of her choice cooking receipts--for she was, thanks to her wise mother's tuition, an eminently practical young lady, and well-skilled in all that goes to make a woman's education complete.

As for Mr. Winthrop, the girl, so sweet and womanly, grew very dear indeed to him, and became the bright center around which revolved all his hopes and ambitions. Love with Howard Winthrop was no light matter. As the ocean is stirred by a tempest, so his nature was moved to its profound depths by his love for Elaine.

It was May. A little party had exchanged for a few days the gray city for the sweet, green country, and among them were Mr. Winthrop and Elaine.

"It makes me feel like writing spring poetry," said the girl, as the two were strolling over the verdant meadows. "By the way, Mr. Winthrop, you never published that poem I gave you a year ago. I don't believe you intended to--this last with a charming poet."
