My thoughts, when I was at the ruins of Silchester recently, were that hundreds of antiquarians all over the country would have given gold to anyone who should have told them of the great purifies and vitalizes the blood and "find" that was there and then to be safely brought to hand, says a letter in London Truth. A friend and myself strolled over from Aldermaston to view the ruins and as many of the "finds" as were still to be seen. Mr. Davis, F. S. A., at present superintending the operations, explained to us how, when digging out an old well, he made the lucky discovery of a tunnel which conducted him to an ancient gate, the existence of the work at this point had been going the swelling had gone down. My on, and within the last week it had been discovered that this was an old Roman tub-well. The wood seemed somewhat rotten, as might be expected after 1,600 years, so that the raising of the tub caused the greatest anxiety. The tub had been ingeniously fitted by Mr. Davis with two wooden shelves running all round it-one at the top and the other at the bottom, both of which served to protect it from any strain durwithout the consent of law; or, as in the case of semi-civilized or uncivilized stood beneath the dome of the nation's political fabric depend, and we de-also relieved the tub of its own weight ing the preparation for hoisting it, and one unsuccessful attempt to bring it up, during which a small portion of it was

Birds, especially ruffed grouse or partridges, are fond of "dusting" in the dry spots where trees have been uprooted, exposing sand or mould to the sun or in the roads and trails. Their dusting places are different from the rolling places of a fox or other mammal. The bird flaps its wings and scratches the dirt with its claws, leaving marks sometimes mistaken for the pawing of a deer. The rolling place of Delaware, Lackawana & a mammal is unmistakable. There the earth is packed, while in the dusting place it is shaken up.

There is also to be noticed about the heart and other organs an appearance as if the nutrition had been seriously interfered with. The organs present a pale and flabby look, very similar to that seen in cases of extreme exhaustion from hemorrhage or starvation. This is probably due to nervous disturbance, as well as to the fact that in all cases of shock the appetite is se-been materially reduced. Cuba furnishes less than a third of the luggish and the need of a tonic and altera- sponges used abroad, but the curtailment of that supply helps to put up prices that have been advancing for years. The supply of sponges comes from Florida, Cuba, Nassau, Mexico and the Mediterrnean. Ordinarily about two-thirds of the supply, in value, comes from American waters.

The demand for sponges has increased naturally, while the world's supply has not kept pace with it. It has within recent years actually diminished, owing to careless methods of increased demand.

The sponge is of slow growth; it takes two or three years for it to attain a commercial size. In all countries in whose waters sponges grow there are laws against the pulling of little sponges until they have reached a Tickets are on sale on Sundays only; are certain growth, just as there are laws good on all passenger trains; but are valid going and returning only on date of issue. the Rev. Feeman, after which Major and called the attention of the family Gifford led the soldiers and audience in to it. The aldermen then ran across Salvation favorite "Good Old Army."

duce the speaker, using as the basis of pany responded quickly, and in a few his remarks the parable of the rich minutes work succeeded in putting out man who gave a feast to which all his the fire. wealthy associates were invited, but to which they all refused to come on one excuse and another, thus causing the host to send his servants out into the poor and distressed as guests to his feast. It was work like this he said the Salvation Army was doing, going to the drunkard and the outcast.

The commander is a trifle above the medium height, a gaunt nervous blonde, dred stairs to his airy lookout in the partly bald. He wore a long blue coat and under it a red blouse, of the same color, but differing in cut from that worn by officers and soldiers in the local corps. He is a nervous man and 3.16 inches of water fell. In the first speaks rapidly when he once warms to eleven hours the precipitation was 1.30 his topic. He was obliged, however, to make a very noticible reference to his did considerable toward bringing the notes, whenever he came to a new subhead in his discourse.

By the grace of God he would try to make himself known in heaven. He considered it a disgrace to any chris-tian, especially to any Salvationist, to be so unknown in heaven that when he came to die the angel at the gate would have to fumble through the records to see if his name were written in the riel, or whoever it was who edited the heavenly War Cry with some copy.

From this introduction he passed on to tell of the army, its inception, its work and its size. He only alluded to the split in the ranks caused by the withdrawing of Ballington Booth by saying that though the army had passed through a very grave crisis the work was still prosperous. He had found, he said, in his travels about the country thet found is the said found is the sa that good progress was being made in every direction, and he was pleased to be able to present so encouraging a report. Speaking of the farm colonies, he said that as an adjunct to these it had been decided to appropriate Mayor Pingree's potato patch idea and use it as a step between the city and the farm colony. The potato patch plan, he said, however, was to be made a great portion of the social scheme for India.

While on the subject of India he recited briefly his own experience as a Salvationist in that country. He landed there fourteen years ago as the leader of a band of four pioneer Salvationists. The little band met much opposition among the Hindoos, not the least of which was the opposition of the law. As the commander put it he had not only been an administrator of the law, but he had been a jailbird too, having been put in prison seven times, for in-sisting on walking the streets and hold-ing open air meetings. He said the work there now was in a flourishing condition, with thousands being brought under the army standard every year
