There were 111 votes cast on the temperance resolutions in the Democratic convention at Lansing last week, and the total number of delegates present was but slightly in excess of that number. This is a sad showing for a major party, and indicates to what lengths the should stand in the way of a thorough disorganization of the Democracy in Michigan has gone. A better showing of interest might have been expected in view of the fine run made by the Democrats' candidate for governor last fall. But Mr. Hemans' exceptional run was due to conditions outside the Democracy. He was the beneficiary of a well organized bolt by Republicans, who, however, voted for no other Democratic candidate and who are now as firmly affiliated with their old party as ever. At the Lansing convention there were but two delegates present from the upper peninsula, and dozens of counties were not represented at all. "What's the use" seems to express the present frame of mind of the Michigan Democracy.

In view of the recent demonstrations of anti-Japanese sentiment on the Pacific coast, and the serious predicament which faced this government as a consequence thereof, these observations by Secretary Root are particularly timely. Speaking of the actual causes of war today the speaker specified three, which in his opinion covered the field. First, an actual or threatened wrong by one nation to another; second, the result of a suspicion by one country that another intends to do it wrong, and that leads the country that suspects the attack to attack first; and third, bitterness of feeling, dependent in no degree on substantial difference of opinion.
