LONE HOLLOW; Or, The Peril of the Penroys.

A Thrilling and Romantic Story of Love and Adventure.

BY JAMES M. MERRILL, AUTHOR OF "BOGGIS BILL," "FISHER JOE" AND OTHER STORIES.

[Copyright, 1889, by the A. N. Kellogg Newspaper Company.]

"This is madness," declared the young hunter. "To quarrel thus on account of a girl. Must the softer sex always bring war? I gave you credit for better sense, Captain Starbright."

CHAPTER VIII.

A few days later, Grace Penroy and Lura Joyce stood together in the room of the former. Grace had just loosened her waving masses of yellow hair, and stood by the glass combing the golden strands, while her cousin leered against a richly-carved mantel over the narrow grate...

feeling: "None of the gentlemen named are apt to me." "Not one!" Lura Joyce seemed surprised. "That is the truth, Lura. I beg you to say nothing about any of these fortune-hunters."

"Ah, there's the rub!" exclaimed Miss Joyce, with a merry laugh. "I understand the situation exactly. You don't encourage one of these fellows for fear he is looking only after your fortune. I've no doubt your fears are not ill-founded. I have been at Lone Hollow but a fortnight, yet in that comparatively short space of time I have made a discovery."

"I shall be wise enough not to wed one I do not love," answered the heiress, simply. "Well said, cousin. I hope you will stick to that text." "You may be sure that I will!" "Now tell me, is there one that you do love, Grace?"

Grace pressed the note to her lips, while tears flowed freely. She breathed easier then, and a happy smile touched her face as she came to her feet, after concealing the precious letter.

"I've heard there is a short cut to the town," mused the young girl as she rode out of the hollow at an easy pace. "And they do say that it leads past old Mother Cabera's hut, the gipsy fortune-teller. I should have a good notion to take that route. I should save time, and might see the old hag, to boot. What say, Romeo, shall we take the path or the dusty road to Stonefield?"

"Mercy on us, here we have the old gipsy fortune-teller now!" exclaimed Lura, drawing rein within a few paces of the old woman. "My good woman, am I on the right road to Stonefield?"

"I see clouds ahead, trouble, a life sacrificed to the greed of one man," uttered the fortune-teller, at length, in a solemn voice. "The smile that had rested until this moment on the face of Lura Joyce vanished, and a cooling sensation crept over her gay spirits."

"That is all." Mother Cabera at once moved away toward the cabin. "With a long, quivering sigh, Lura resumed her journey. She was not superstitious, but, nevertheless, the words of the old wood witch had a deep effect, and brought unpleasant thoughts to the mind of the orphan girl."

"I don't suppose the letter amounts to much after all. Grace can write another, and there are other days to come in which it can be delivered, but it is provoking after all. I wonder if old Mother Cabera had a hand in the mischief. I'll interview the lady when I again strike her mansion."

"I've had the letter," said Lura, with a look of satisfaction. "I've had it all right, and it was a very good one. I'll interview the lady when I again strike her mansion."

A SOLAR CYCLONE.

The Sun Composed of Columns of Intensely Hot Metallic Vapors. Those who have looked through a large telescope under favorable atmospheric conditions at one of those immense cyclones which occasionally break out on the sun, have derived from what they saw a very good idea of the origin of sunlight.

"I will not tell you more, the picture is too black. Poor child! poor child!" and Mother Cabera dropped the girl's hand and turned away her head, as if to shut out some terrible vision.

His Monthly Shopping.

Farmer—How many yards of that truck will it take to make their old woman or dress? Clerk—About twelve, I should say. "At three cents a yard it comes to thirty-six cents. I reckon twelve or a little more'n she'll need. Just cut off six yards. Times is mighty close an' we hev ter be leetle savin'."
