100 Preachers From the Christian Church are Women is Report

(By Associated Press) DECATUR, Ill., Aug. 19.—Since the first woman preacher of the Disciples of Christ (Christian church) was ordained forty-seven years ago, their number has grown slowly but steadily until now nearly one hundred of their preachers are women. This fact is reported in a report by the International Women Preachers' Assn. of Decatur, who has just rounded out her thirtieth year in the ministry.

According to Mrs. Mowbray, in the number of women preachers in the denomination, and leaving the oldest among them, Mrs. C. C. Haddock of Erie, Pa., there are 100 in the '100'. Haddock has right the most farthest number. Success and growth of the women preachers' organization, Mrs. Mowbray said, "have women even business and public leaders, are slow to organize and do not seem to see the need of co-operation. Women manage their own homes and in business life their leaders."

Let us serve you with Real Leather Goods, appreciated by discriminating buyers.

Prices on Real Leather Goods are down to where they were three years ago. For instance:

- The average Deane Hand Bag, Traveling Case, Hand Bag, Boston or Overnight Bag, which was sold for $22.50, is now $18.00.
- Nothing better than an exceptional value. Other bags from $4.50 up.

It Pays to Buy Good Luggage

An Expert Once Said: "About one in a thousand can tell the genuine natural flesh grain leather from the imitation. You must know more of the thousand than can't make the detection, so why take the chance? You must know more in buying your luggage here. We want your confidence and good will as well as your business. Both are essential."

Remember, any piece of leather, either split or surface, such as thin as paper, is not the way's look can be stamped "Genuine Cow Hide" and is not misrepresentational. But, how long will such a bag wear? In appearance it is as good as the best. How can you tell?

Our Brand of Quality Guarantees You Against Such Defection.

Here are some Real Values in Portfolios

- 15 Inch One Packet $6.50
- 15 Inch Two Packet $7.50

A PLAN TO CHANGE A CLIMATE

Simple feat of engineering which a group of British capitalists has proposed to the Canadian government will, we are solemnly assured, alter completely part of this continent. This is to be effected by the building of a dam across the straits of Belle Isle which separate Newfoundland from the coast of Labrador.

Momentous change will follow the construction of this dam, we are told. The Greenland current which flows down from the Arctic regions and enters the Gulf of St. Lawrence through the straits will be diverted and caused to curve around on itself and return to the Arctic ocean somewhere to the west of Norway.

The picture is an enticing one for Canadians, but what about Great Britain, Norway and other countries, which depend for their very existence upon the Gulf stream, and without which they would be as cold and barren as the Hudson Bay region?

The ocean charts show the Greenland current sweeping north the eastern coast of Newfoundland and meeting the Gulf stream when it apparently passes under and is lost. A branch of it undoubtedly does enter the straits of Belle Isle, carrying with it large icebergs which must have some effect upon the climate.

A VANISHING TERROR

Astronomers appear to have accepted, with some doubts and reservations, the statement issued from an observatory at Heidelberg that the earth has just passed through a comet's tail. If it is true, then comets have finally reached the end of a long process of degradation in earthly esteem.

Science was a long while in satisfying credulous humanity upon this point, but further study of comets led to the conclusion that their fearsome tails were nothing at all for all human purposes, but persisting pessimists suggested that the tails were gas and poison gas at that.

That was the last refinement of the cometary terror, but if Heidelberg is right the earth has gone clean through a comet's tail without discovering the fact until after it was all over with.

One of the things that the delegates to the disarmament conference will discover is that Secretary Hughes is a man who knows how to ask pertinent questions. He proved that in the insurance investigation years ago.

A New York financier proposes that all of the world's gold be gathered into one reserve. If there is a doubt about where to keep it, Mr. Levine would doubtless be found willing to make room for it in Moscow.

The speed limit on country roads has been raised from 25 to 35 miles, and thereby a good many owners of second hand gas buses will be deprived of the exhilaration which comes from breaking the law.

The prohibitive duty imposed upon reimportation of American army supplies sold abroad will at least prevent this country from being reminded of any bad bargains it may have made.

Perhaps the recent order by the council of commissars in Russia permitting the sale of wine is based upon the idea that starving Russians would like to die happy.

An American dollar is now worth 1.15 Austrian crowns. This statement refers to money, the imperial crown, as such, being worth even less.

SPANISH DOUBLOONS
By CAMILLA KENYON
Copyright, The Doble-Nord Company

But Mr. Tabbs' character possessed none of that unassailable solidity which would make harsh measures necessary under such conditions. His confidence, as the illustrious conversation of the pirates had proceeded, lost the speckled appearance which had characterized it at the height of his terrors.

Outburst came, as he spoke, the tail of it and was described. I saw his lips form at Mr. Shaw's ear the words, "Wonderful little sport, by Jove!"

A strong shuffling had come over Captain Vane. For the first time in my knowledge of him he showed the consciousness of only the slight consequences of the difference between Norwegian blood and the ordinary Saxonian fluid. His shoulders sagged, he lost his habitual easy bounce and set erect and tall. Something stern and apologetic showed through the smooth quality of his face, as that thought of shuffling knights stretched on shoreward towards the High Stambon church. He was their true descendant, after all, this slow, calm, gentle-mannered Challenger. It was a young man that I had met playing with me and the class were there, strong and terrible in their velvet sheath.

Captain Tony, having finished his pipe, knocked the ashes out against the heel of his boot and put the pipe in his pocket. "Well," he said, stretching, "I'd rather have a pipe, but business is business, so let's get down to it. Which of these boys has the blue on the staff, Magnus?"

As we are trying to bluff you. You are a conceited fellow, you boys—good, but you're too good to me after the bunch of shifts I've been playing up to here! All I ask is, to let me in on it with you, and I'll be glad to pay you a size to the best tricks of a sly old fox who ain't ever been caught yet without two holes to his burrow. I ain't ask no fault, nor in your quarter, either, though I just shined up for that damn with the old girl here, but give me your own, and a bunch of five wires like you boys. I've now froze into a plaster figure of Yrime what with fakin' like a Sunday school class and sparin' one old maid and matchin' out like I wouldn't last better with the other. So if I'll still ship along of you, better, and will off to the China coast, somewhere where the speaking is good and the police are as many and try how far I'll transfer, doubloons will go!"

With a rooky little grin in her throat Aunt Jane fell limply against me. It was too much. All day long she had been tossed back and forth like a shuttlecock by the battlements of enigma. She had borne the shock of Mr. Tabbs' greed for gold, his obliquity to the expedition, his boldness to herself, she had been shaken to the center of the earth, and now she was to be the center of the earth.

Mr. Tabbs made his whole heart and unshining proposal Captain Tony spread his small black eyes and contemplated him with attention. Then he glanced round upon his fellows. "What say, boys? Shall we slip old Washburn on the schooner and let him have his fling along with us? No?" And his partner Tony uttered those words, the lid of his left eye rolled, for an instant that intelligent smile.

From the pirates came a scattering volley of assents. "All right—hooray for old Washburn—sure, close the door!"

"All right, Washburn, the boys are willing," I spoke, as better than moving forward that chest of doubloons!"

"I was speaking to my niece," replied Aunt Jane with unutterable dignity from her corner. Her small features had all but disappeared in her swollen face, and her hair had slipped down at a rakish angle over one eye. But of course, being Aunt Jane, she must choose this moment to be queenly.

"There, there, auntie," I said soothingly, "of course you are not going to leave your bones on this island. If you did you know, you and Bill Hail—well might hunt around together—think how cozy!" (Here Aunt Jane gave a convulsive shudder.) As to my being married, if you were betting just now on anybody's chance, they would have to be Captain Magnus, wouldn't they?"

"Good gracious, Virginia!" shrieked Aunt Jane faintly. But I went on relentlessly, determined to distract her mind from thoughts of her approaching end.

"All things considered, I suppose I really ought to ask you to put my affairs in order when you get back. If I am carried off by the pirates, naturally I shall have to jump overboard at once, though I dislike the idea of drowning, and especially of being eaten by sharks. Would you mind putting up a little headstone? It needn't cost much—in the family plot, with just 'Virginia' on it. Any thing of mine that you don't want yourself I'd like to have for the lady, please. Ask her when the little duck is old enough to tell her my sad story."

By this time Aunt Jane was sobbing loudly and waving her little hands about in wild beseeching.

"Jane!" I looked at Miss Browne again in awful pain. But at that moment the door of the cabin opened and the face of Slinker peered in.

"Say," he remarked, "there ain't no sense in you girls stayin' cooped up here that I see. I guess me and Horney can stand you off if you try to rush me. Come out and cool off a little."

The great heat of the day was over and the sun already dropping behind the peak of the island. Mr. Shaw and Culbert had been allowed to sit in the shade, and I thought their wrists were not too tightly bound for comfort. Cookie had been released, and under the eye of Horner was getting supper. Grasse had earlier in the day received a kick in the ribs from Captain Magnus, fortunately too much occupied with the prisoners, to pursue his vengeance further, and had fled precipitately to my enormous relief. The day was quite safe enough to know that he would help me best by keeping out of the clutches of our roustabout.

Just then there came from the woods the sound of footsteps and voices, and the three pirates and Mr. Tabbs entered the clearing. A third man through the camp, Captors and captives forgot all else but the great burning question—had the treasure been discovered? And I am sure that no one was so qualified as I, although in my mind the question took another form.

For now I was going to know what had been waiting for me here in the cave, when I stood yesterday at its black entrance, afraid to go in.

CHAPTER XVI.

From Dead Hands. At the head of the file, Capt. Tony advanced through the clearing, and what with his flaring black beard, his partly worn and a tattered dramatic dagger which he possessed he looked so entirely fitting and operative that you expected to hear him at any moment burst out in a sonorous bass. With a swaying gait he came down upon the table two brown canvas bags, which opened and discharged from gaping mouths a flood of silver coins.

Slinker and the roustabout man shuffled about, cowering and snatched at the coins with a savage greed.

"Good, good, so you said!" It's the doubloons, all right—where's the rest of 'em?" These cries broke from Slinker and Horney continuously as the gold fell jangling between their eager fingers.

was all ready and waiting. Because all we had to do was to say 'Thank you, to the fellow that handed 'em out. We got these here bags of doubloons, as I says, without havin' to dig for 'em—once we had found the cave, which it's go thanks to old Washburn we ain't looking for it yet. We got these here bags, right out of the fists of a skeleton. Most of 'em was under a rock, which had fell from the roof and phoned him amiss-like. Most of squashed him like a beetle, I guess, but he'd still keep his hold on the bags."

"I turned aside, for fear that anyone should see how white I was. To the rest, those poor bones might indeed bear mute witness to a tragedy, but a tragedy looking outlines, vague, impersonal, without pathos. To me they told with dreadful clearness the last sad chapter of the tale of Peter; Peter who had made me so intimately his confidante, whose love and hopes and solitary strivings I knew all about.

Vaguely I heard around me a babble of exclamations and conjectures. Murmurs of interest rose even from our captive load. Then came Slinker's voice, loud with sudden fear.

"Say, you don't suppose the the House hold of pin away with the rest of the coin, do you?" he demanded.

"I'd swear with it? Tony contemptuously thrust aside the possibility. 'Got away with it here? He sure didn't leave the (400) with it, did he? Would he be taking it up from one place just to bury it in another? This! Must of wanted to work it out. Now, my notion is that this happened to one of the guys that was burying the gold, and that the rest just left 'em there for a sort of scare-crow to keep other people out of the cave."

"But the gold?" protested Slinker. "That wouldn't have that for a scare-crow, would it?"

"Maybe not," admitted Tony, "but suppose that other dead avin' show, and went on holdin' and clutchin' at that bag? Well, that sure wouldn't be a pleasant place to stay in, would it? And no one would have the nerve to touch them bags, would they? You know a stings man, especially when he dies hard, can have a awful grip. So what they done was not to shovel the sand in on the gold they'd stowed away, and light out quick."

If the possibility of this reasoning was more remarkable than its issue, the pirates were not the men to find fault with it. Death is the most eloquent of advocates, and the few robbers had only to begin to be soberly sober in anti-spoiling all the fruits of their iniquitous schemes. The eight of the golden coins intercalated them. They played with the doubloons like children, juggling them in their enlarged palms, guessing at weight and value, calculating their equivalent in the way of living. Laughter and banter responded.

And now the night that I unexpectably dreamed was upon me. But the pirates still thought of nothing but the CHAPTER XVII. Of Which Cookie is the Hero. Next morning I came out of the hut in time to see Mr. Shaw and his companions to divers led forth from the sleeping quarters which they had shared with their captives. They were moved as before to a pain floor, by a rope having a pair of iron or three feet, and their hands bound while they made a hasty breakfast under the eye of a watchful sentinel. Then their wrists were released, not painfully, but with a firmness which made any slipping of their hands impossible.

While the pirates were breakfasting a spirited dispute took place among them as to what should go to the treasure. The prisoners, Slinker and Horney urged with justice that, as they had missed all the excitement of the preceding day, it was their turn to visit the cave. The right to see the bones they passionately claimed. Tony suggested them, and it came with Chris and through Magnus being told of us our entry for the morning.

In leaving the cabin I had slipped into my house a small package, which I had found in Aunt Jane's bag. It was quite heavy, and I satisfied myself that the bones were back. My own large strength and my revolver I had been deprived of at the suggestion of the thoughtful Magnus. I had surrendered them unprotestingly, fearful of all things that no possession might be transferred and Peter's diary, though hidden with much art at the bottom of the bag, he brought to light. For I might yet see the secret of the Island Queen at a price which should reassure us all.

From Orient to Arctic

Action scene that and far in the photograph "Thorne" a scene of war and thrills, in which the hero rushes off with his wife and baby from the Orient, where he believes a shadow of two hours over his lips, to Alaska—where, naturally, everything turns out happily. John Gilbert and Marie Prevost, starring here, are the winners in the new film.

TWO M. E. BOYS CONFERENCES IN SEPTEMBER

Churches at Adrian and Benton Harbor Preparing Convention for Older Boys in Congregations.

DETROIT, Aug. 19. - Older boys conferences will again be a feature of the two big Methodist Episcopal conferences in Michigan, that of the Detroit M. E. conference at Adrian, September 13 to 19, and the Michigan conference at Benton Harbor, September 20 to 26.

Older boys of high school age were invited to a factor in the church faith series two years ago, such churches being requested to delay the expenses of an elaborate and the success attending the movement has been marked. Last year there were more than 150 boys in each conference, including the Detroit M. E. church, is arranging this year's program which will include a "boy and son" summer at which the boys will be guests of the preacher, a baseball game between the delegates and the boys, a talk by Bishop Henderson on "The Preacher a Real Man" and a debate on the subject. It is expected that the boys will be a greater asset to the church than the church to the boys.

The purpose of the older boys conferences is to solve the problem of leading the boy to the church. The State Board of Christian Education is sponsoring the movement.
