ough investigation as to the practicability of transferring the major portion of his activities to Escanaba, and during several extended conferences which he held with Mr. English and his associates, he became firmly convinced that such was the proper course to pursue. Then and there he announced his intention to enter his future program of industrial expansion at Escanaba, inasmuch as by so doing it would eventually mean the saving of a considerable amount of money to him.

Shortly afterwards the first faint rumblings of the panic of 1873 began to be heard. Convulsively with a vice-like grip he grasped the eastern manufacturing districts, slowly extending westward. News then arrived at Escanaba that the Jamestown foundry of New York could not meet its outstanding obligations which it owed the furnace, and which amounted to some thirty-four thousand dollars.

And so if the panic of 1873 had not burrowed into the very vitals of the nation, Andrew Carnegie, according to the plans he had formulated, would have made Escanaba a tremendous metropolis of the Northwest. But what about the city we might have been? What would it look like today?

Conservatively I would say it would have been a city of some five hundred thousand souls. Without effort it would have stretched out far enough to absorb the smaller places in its immediate vicinity.

It would have tall skyscrapers towering into the sky. It would have richly adorned civic buildings, a court house, the Carnegie library and library, alone costing 10,000,000 dollars, would have been its richest jewel, for it would have been yours for the asking.

Your waterfront would have been lined with wharves, where day and night steamships would load and unload the immense volume of freight that would be handled here.

Back of those wharves would be your manufacturing district, your plate mills, tube mills, steel mills, iron foundries, brass and bronze works, machine shops, rolling mills, and so on. Innumerable other kindred industries would have been there, their smokestacks pouring their heavy smoke into the sky with their herd light.

Myriads and myriads of people would swarm over your wide streets to be swallowed alive in the early morning by your manufacturing plants, and at the first faint sign of dusk they would again be spread forth into your congested streets.

Years would have been a heterogeneous city. As San Francisco has her Chinatown, you would have your "little Italy," your "little Poland," your "little Greece," as well as those and upon thousand of Hungarians, Slovaks, Ruthenians, Spaniards, Germans, and Belgians, for you would largely draw from those districts in the "old country" whose people came from mining regions. Yours would have been a problem to mould them into a homogeneous whole.

You would have possibly two hundred churches of various denominations. You would have about forty hospitals, some of them costing millions of dollars. Your educational institutions would be many and varied, grade schools, high schools, both junior and senior, trade and technical schools as well as junior colleges would make your city "a seat of learning."

You would have—but why continue? We aren't the city we might have been because—if that's it, if.

And tonight an old man sits and smokes and reads, and dreams of the visions he once held, and he shudders when he thinks of that cold Christmas day in 1873 when he "blew her out" and in that dying flame saw the mirage of the city we might have been, slowly flicker and then—then die out.

NO 'BUTTERFLY' SAYS WIFE OF CHASE OSBORN

Mrs. Osborn Says She Cares Little for Society.

Went With Husband on Many Trips in Wilds and Was Even Kidnapped by Chinese Bandits.

Mrs. Chase S. Osborn, who left in the evening of her wretched life, has been separated from her husband, has very little to say respecting their marital disagreement, but rather deplores the publicity that has been given the affair.

While her husband has been hunting and fishing near the Soo, Mrs. Osborn has been taking treatment for her nerves at a Battle Creek sanatorium.

"I have taken no court action, and never will," Mrs. Osborn said when shown the statement quoting her husband as saying that she belonged to civilization's higher sphere, while he was essentially a man of the out-bullets through their windows. Their two eldest children were born in their jute cabin in Florence. Finally Mr. and Mrs. Osborn returned to Milwaukee, but soon after he began his wanderings throughout the north, his exploring trips that resulted in his vast holdings in the Iron Country. He soon was known as a millionaire, several times over. With a trifle of his wealth, he bought a newspaper in Sault Ste. Marie and established a home there, but never left of his explorations.

His wife was with him on all his trips. She even went with him on iron prospecting expeditions in the South Seas, Samoa, Tahiti, Fiji, New Zealand, Tasmania, Japan and China. When the war broke out they were couching it together in Europe.

STATE FERRY IS NETTING PROFITS

Report of Season's Operation Shows Black Ink Results in the Ledger.

The wisdom of the action by the state legislature providing an auto ferry across the Straits of Mackinac from Mackinac City to St. Ignace is eloquently demonstrated in the report compiled by Chief Accountant C. A. Parker.

The report shows total receipts of $28,919 since the ferry started the first of August. It is shown that the total operating expenses were $15,807.59 and the net of the Mackinac City and St. Ignace is $13,111.40.

The value of the transportation system for motor vehicles across the straits is proven by this enterprise and the surplus of operating expenses is a substantial sum toward wiping out the original investment.

Approximately 16,000 motor vehicles were carried by the ferry. It has been clearly demonstrated that the single boat operated this season has been inadequate to the demands of the traffic and the results justify the purchase of two steel steamers from the government by the administrative board as announced a short time ago.

NOVELTY PLANT WILL SOON GET INTO OPERATION

Incorporation Papers Are Being Prepared for Filing and Other Preliminaries Rushed.

"Our corporation papers have come from Lansing and plans and work are progressing rapidly," said Fred Evans in regard to the new specialties factory which will operate in the old Oliver hotel.

Attorney James C. Baker is taking care of the legal work and reports that everything is "set."

Fred Evans of New York came to Escanaba in August to plan new methods and machinery for the Steel-Wal-lace Corporation and when his unusual ability for starting things was learned, several of Escanaba's keenest and most prominent business men asked him to start the factory.

"I like Escanaba and I like the people. It seems good not to have to rush and hurry all of the time as one has to do in large cities. It is calm here and I have more time in which to do things. I like it very much. My few months here have seemed like a vacation to me," said Mr. Evans.

The Escanaba Specialty Manufacturing Company, as it is called, will manufacture household necessities, toys, novelties and accessories. It will employ about 150 men the first year and as the factory grows, more will be given jobs.

"I know I can find a market for the things manufactured for I have a very competent sales department that extends from coast to coast," said Mr. Evans in regard to the selling of the articles manufactured.

LEAPS 13 STORIES; DIES 6 HOURS LATER KANSAS CITY, Mo. Mrs. E. E. Naber, 29 years old, lived six hours after jumping from an office building window, striking a wire screen fifteen floors below. She died at midnight. Mrs. Naber had been ill and escaped from a nurse an hour before she made the suicidal plunge.
