The Democrats in this county made but little noise over the appearance here of the great agitator—Richard Trevellick. Some of them believe he is only talking for their party while the money holds out.

John L. Sullivan has probably fought his last battle in the prize ring, and Grover Cleveland will lay by his belt in November. There are men who will sympathize with these two worthies over their discomforts-the majority of whom live on the east side of the Atlantic ocean.

The real platform this year is the dimer-pail, for the issue of over-shadowing importance is the wages of the workingman. Food and clothing were never so cheap and so good as now. The question is, shall wages come down, too? Mr. Cleveland and his followers say "yes." The Republicans say "no." Let the people decide,

In the schools and colleges of the U.S., where young men are educated and from which they graduate deeply and from which they graduate deeply impressed with the superior knowledge of the learned men who have been their teachers, rec'trade is taught as one of the sesential principles upon which rests the science of political commons. Coffee graduates make their debut into practical, busy business life fully armed, equipped and entrenched in much vollege wisdom to do battle for free trade theories; but what is the present their interior what is the result? Those Who Are Not Young

Those Who Are Not Young.
This seems to be the age in which, in too many households everything revolves around the young. Their pleasures, their plans, their hopes and aspirations furnish the conversation and are the end and after of the daily household life.

We say, let the young be happy; let them have a happy youth, for youth comes but once. Let them have their drams, their romances, ayo, their frivollities unchecked.

we say, let the young be happy_let then have a happy youth, for youth comes but once. Let them have their drasms, their romances, ayo, their frivollites unchecked.

It is important that youth should be happy. It passes so swiftly and the days unhallowed by happiness never return. That child is defrauded of liftight who has not known the joy of earse-free, gold, protected childhood; not the hop or girl, the young mun or maden, for the loss of it.

But this truth is like many another than the undiscriminating would look at only on the fitting would look at only on him is truth the objects, a deep and noble interest. The daughters of the household wera-always a lift it to hate of sentiment, about them. But the father and the mother who think of them with any yestige of romante feeling? They nave unbeaufful lines on the brow, and the crow has loft his tracks at the corners of their anxious eyes. He has gray locks and a girzled beard, and who would look for any of the feeling of youth where age has so plainly set its seal?

There is much sweet cant about the beauty and glory of motherhood. The poots sling of a beautified being, with a cherub in her arms, or of the sanity and glory of motherhood. The posts sing of a beautified being, with a cherub in her arms, or of the sanity and glory of motherhood. The posts sing of a beautified being, with a cherub in her arms, or of the sanity and glory of motherhood. The posts sing of a beautified being, with a cherub in her arms, or of the sanity and glory of motherhood. The posts sing of a beautified being, with a cherub in her arms, or of the sanity and the post of the same and the post of the same of the cause she loved. And no cee the same of the cause she loved, And no cee the cause of the same of the cause she loved. And no cee the same of the cause she loved. And no cee the same of the cause she loved. And no cee the same of the cause she loved, and the would say it the following her the same of the cause she loved. And no cee the same of the cause she loved. And no cee sakes.

And he would say, if he sald anything, and the, mother would say it also, that they didn't want them to know—they wanted them to have a springtime of happiness.
And do the children ever really understand and thank those self-denying parents?

Not often; certainly not always.
Father is supposed to have an instinctive and natural liking and aptitude for hard work. It stands to reason than ha feels most at home worrying at home worrying ok-books, or getting up at night to visit the sick, or studying up knotty points in law. Not being young, he cannot care for the things that interest the young, litis checks are furrowed, and the assumption is that his heart must be so likewise. And there is nothing very pictures que about the commonphace mother, self-demial and daily care are possibly good for the soul, but they do not tend to the beautifying of the body. They do not give to face or form the enditions that the poet or the painter demands.

And the children go on their way, sheltered from care and work and worry, thinking very little of thosewho do so much and suffer so much for their sakes. They do not, realize that the ecaseless effort to provide for, editante and furnish for them those pleasures that are heuthful for mind and body, though a sacred duty, sanctlined by love, is still sometimes a heavy burlen hard to bear.

In their gladness and courage and beauty, full of the desire for pleasure or the hope of advancement, they fail to give the appreciation, love and devotion which is the return the parents most long for, and which, freely given, is a reward for all toil and all self-denial.

And yet sometimes it would seem a humane thing to consider the elder is a reward for all toll and all self-denial.

And ye sometimes it would seem a hunane thing to consider the elder ones of a household a little more and the little ones a little less to retuent the part of the less fore the young, and that the senergy and abounding statistic of youth make every less a glad one; that the path before the short, and some long its way.

It is well to remember that, though freshness fides and muscles harden, hearts may keep young or grow more tender the longer they live and love and suffer.

That middle-lifo—aye, old ago—may hearts may keep young or give and suffer.

That middle-life—aye, old age —may have not only its struggles, -work, disappointment and ascrifices, but it may also have its aspirations. There is now and then a father working like a horse in a tread-mill, who knows he might have been a Pegnaus had not circumstances ellipsed his wings; had not little hands forced him into harness and made him a common hack. Many a knowl hungering and thirsting-for its own yet accepts the bitter bread and the tasteless draught that dearer lips may taste true bread and wine. There is now and then a midter who ditensms of a life she might have lived had freedom from care and work given her time to put her dreams into form and color.

It sometimes happens that when the heat and burden of the day is over, when the birds have flown from the heat and burden of the day is over, when the birds have flown from the inests, that the old ambitions awaken in the mindis that have been so long devoted to the endless question of ways and mems.

Not long ago I received a letter from a woman—an entire-estanger—who said: "I am a woman lifty years old—with aspirations—my children are gone out into the world, etc.," then she began to speak of her dreams and ambittions.

When I read this portion of the letter to a young person near me, abe that she had dreams that were haunted by the cry, "Come over and help us."

The wise man or woman sees that rust gathers on the idle mind they know that frost gathers on the unloring least. Not all the sentiment, romanes and peatry belong to the young. There is no monopoly of hopes, ambitions and aspirations, and, though they are held in check in the elder life that they may have free course and be giorified in the younger, he who has eyes to see is not misled by the fact, though the halr is gray and the cased, has lost its roundness and bloom. And when romanes and sentiment blossom anew in 'the older life, when ambitions and dreams assert themselves afresh it is never the wise man or woman who ories out, there's no fool life the old fool. It is only he o's he who has not learned the evertasting truth that over the soul time has no power.

To the observing eye and the understanding mind it is in the face of the old and not the young that the divinar, beauties shine—O.ARLOTTA PERRY, in Chicano Harald.

THE CAMP FIRE.

Peace and War.

"They shall beat their swords into plough-shares, and their spears into penning hooks; ration shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more."— Isaiah il., 4.

In a red-Hes, mos-grown courtyard of a quaint old German town, Eager for the scattered bread-crumbs come the pigeons circling down.

the pigeons circung dos-Fearless they of any evil, leading not a pre-gratized; "Surely this the home of quiet and of lasting [cace," I said.

Yet, but few years since, that courtyard echoed with the sounds of strife. And the stones with blood were reddened-blood of many a brave young life.

So too is it ever with us; Peace to War is forced to yield. And the quiet home of rest becomes the noisy battle-field.

Yet, why should it ever be so? Oh, if but the When the ploughshare and the pruning-hook shall banish sword and pear!

When the nations shall determing that the art of war shall craws! When all men shall live as brothers, with the world for up at peace! —G. Weatherly in the Quiver for August.

Out of Pigs.

As the end of the civil war drew near, the South found. itself in some straits for food and other necessaries. The blographer of H. W. Allen, who was then Governor of Louisiana, describes the dependence of the people upon him, and his unceasing efforts to keep them from starvation.

A friend stepped into Allen's oilies at Shreveport, and found the Governor reated before the fire, between two country-women—solder and mothers—all tirree taking a common from modification of the common from the modification of the common from the modification of the common from the Capt. Trevellick addressed an audience at Gladstone last Monday evening.

Of the character of his talk: it is unnecessary, to say anything—it was sorely a trade against remulticantsm; of its effect we can give no better iden than by quoting a young man who listened to it and who said "could I vote, and had heard hothing of the difference between the parties except Trevellick's spech, I would vote with the republicans."—Ino Port. ans."-Iron Port.

Rio Grands City has been attacked by a Mexican mob who demand the sur-render of United States Inspector of Customs Selall, who shot a Mexican editor named Garsea, on Saturday.

"I wish to God that every voter in the land could have a copy of these voto messages," said the Connecticut Senator. They certainly bespeak the character of the man in the White House. These veto messages are insulting and disgraceful in tone. Insulting to Congress and a disgrace to the high office of Chief Magistrate. In many cases they contain sentences that reflect seriously on both houses of congress, recklessly accusing the committees of carelessness and favoritism.

In other cases the statements made by the President are untrue. It is untrue, for instance, that the theory thas been adopted that "any cause from which a man died was traceable to service in the army." These and similar insinuations are simply fulse. The language of former Presidents has been dignified and courteous said Sen-ator Hawley. Cleveland, on the conator Hawley. Cleveland, on the con-trary, is course, vulgar and in some cases brual.
