Judges

N/O During the buffeting of a fairly stormy legal career it had not escaped my ~~notice~~^{attention} that there were as many kinds of judges as people. ~~Just~~ Like people, judges could be divided roughly between four classes: the kindly and dumb, the wilful and dumb, the wilful and smart and, finally, the kindly and smart.

The question before the house was whether this judge was one of those comparatively rare birds among the judiciary: one with both heart and brains. We would see, we would see...

It had not escaped my attention, during the buffeting of ^{a family storm} my legal career, that

There were ^{as} many kinds of

He could not mount a Tommy gun on the bar. He could not mount a Tommy gun on the bar -- that too would quiet the play away -- at once and admission of guilt to the rape and and admission of guilt to murder when he killed L. Manning, ^{when he came,} as I have not the slightest doubt he intended to do.

But the man was in a dilemma. He had to make that killing look self-defensive.
He could not shoot L. M. when he came in the door because that would not only admit the rape but convict him of murder. The man had to gamble that he was quicker on the draw than L. Manning. Knowing his own prowess with pistols, he took that gamble. It was his last. We ^{now} know that Barney Quill lost his last and most desperate gamble.
